Not illustrated. 1866 Excerpt: . . . the Queen of Sheba brought Jewels, spices, gold, To Solomon, king of thought. My sweet in herself surpasses The whole of the precious store; The rarest and richest of lasses, Compounded of scents, gems, and ore. From a polishd marble brow Fall locks of gold the brightest; And her ruby lips below Are teeth of pearls the whitest. As gleams of Orient skies Through cypress branches seen, Is the blue of her sapphire eyes Under their ebon screen. From oceans rosiest shells Her cheeks rich tint is drawn; And the music of distant bells Rings in her voices tone. Her breast is the pearl-homes lining, From Omans sunny sea; Her arms the ivory shining, Where gay lamps lighted be. On her lips, the dew I seize Is honey from virgin flowers; Her breath is the scented breeze From Mythas orange bowers. Though in thought, in toast, in song, I place her still before all; She preserves her heart so long, I think it must be coral. Oh, were it the anthracite The swarthy miner raises, A spark of my love should light, And kindle it into blazes! POETS FICTIONS. By The Editor. I PITY the poets that deck the loved fair, In cold, lifeless charms, drawn from earth, sea, and air; Ruby lips, golden ringlets, and diamond eyes, Such creations like Frankenstein-monsters arise. Who would sigh for his love if her forehead were stone Were her eyes real brilliants would he not groan Romantic is he, who...
